Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

I spent one long night spotting fire, and it formed the way that I see the season of Advent.

I was still in grade school the night that a brush fire started between our house and the neighbor's place. The wind kicked up. About bedtime, we realized that our house and barn were not in danger, but our neighbor's homeplace was. We drove north. Dad posted me on the barn roof, where I scanned the sky to the south, watching cinders on the wind and calling out when danger came too near. The others scurried around with shovels stomping on flames and spading earth over the threat.

Things went on that way for several hours before the fire started to burn itself out and the wind stilled. I was tired, smokelogged, and covered with grime. My eyes burned. Just as I felt the fear and panic adrenaline break within me and embraced the feeling of exhausted relief, the first light of dawn tinged the sky. A finger of rose-colored light streaked through the dark blue-violet horizon.

These colors of the breaking dawn are the colors of the candles of the Advent wreath and the vestments the priest wears to the altar during this sacred season of hope. During Advent, we recognize that we are amid suffering and injustice and that something within us longs for the completion of love and healing that is the heart of the Kingdom of God.

The very limits that we experience within ourselves and our society urge us toward completion and fulfillment. We suffer and we seek relief. We grieve and seek to be made whole. We question and long for answers. We find the hope of fulfillment only in the dawning light of God's action for the salvation of the world.

Our world is on fire and many cry in the night, but the light of dawn is already painting our world and drawing us toward perfect justice and mercy. Christ is coming!

That tense and vital anticipation of God's being all in all is the holy season of Advent. We are "already and not yet" people. The Kingdom of God has been inaugurated in the world. So much suffering remains. We long for resolution and completion. Advent teaches us that this tension in our lives is a place where God is present and at work.

The apostles and the early Church knew this compromised position well. They had encountered the risen Lord and knew that Christ had won the victory once for all. Yet they continued to live in a world where they were often outcasts, uncared for, persecuted, and martyred. They witnessed so much evil and suffering.

For faith in Jesus, they suffered alienation from families, careers, temple and synagogues. They endured the hardship of unprotected travel in the ancient world to preach the good news. They suffered resistance, violence and sometimes persecution. Crime, wars, political intrigue and natural disasters did not stop. They knew those too.

How did our ancestors in faith stoke their trust that God was guiding them toward His Kingdom? They lifted the voices of those who had seen the approaching Kingdom from near and far and who counsel us to wait actively.

Today the Church continues to lift Isaiah, John the Baptist, Mother Mary to sustain our hearts as we wait for the light to grow in our world and to cast out darkness and the threats that lurk in the shadows. These witnesses cry out to us to wait patiently for the gift and to work actively to prepare for the King's arrival in the world. They urge us to ease his coming by preparing a place for Jesus in our hearts, our families, and our communities.

This is Advent. We are exhausted by the evil in the world and the constant defense we must muster. We grow weary at the sheer number of the sick, broken, dying, war-torn, hungry and scattered folks (all of us really). And just as the grief and call for action threatens to become too much light, as from a single rose colored candle brightens the violet bruise of our horizon. And we hear, “Prepare the way of the Lord.”

May this Advent be a season of constant prayer, charitable action, resistance to evil, and growth in trusting faith for you, and me, and the entire Church in Covington. The dawn approaches.

Jesus is coming!

Most Rev. John Iffert

December 2023

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

On the weekend of December 16 and 17, the Diocese will conduct the Retirement Fund for Religious Collection. This annual appeal benefits 25,000 elderly Catholic sisters, brothers, and priests nationwide.

Our country’s numerous hospitals, Catholic schools and social service agencies that were founded and supported by religious orders of men and women benefit us today and will continue to benefit future generations. Their faith and sacrifice are great examples of Christ’s love. I am asking for your assistance to show them our love by supporting them in their retirement.

Your gift to the Retirement Fund for Religious offers support that helps religious communities provide loving care for older members while ensuring younger ones can continue the good works of their elders.

Retirement income for our religious is minimal, while the cost of health care, medications, and nursing assistance continue to rise. Your financial contribution to this collection will help offset these rising costs. We are reminded in Hebrews 13:16, “Share what you have; God is pleased by sacrifices of that kind.” Thank you for your generosity, and please pray for our retired religious men and women.

Yours Devotedly in Christ,

Most Rev. John C. Iffert
Bishop of Covington

Adult leaders — volunteers, catechists, teachers, coaches, campus ministers, youth ministers, chaperones, retreat leaders, and all who desire to serve the young church — are needed to join the youth in their excitement. THRIVE! Is a gathering of youth ministers. Come hungry. Dinner and spiritual nourishment will be provided, including a positive, prayerful and productive night filled with information to help our Diocese THRIVE! RSVP by Dec 2, at covdio.org/youth.

As the Diocese and parishes finalize their three-year pastoral plans, the With One Heart initiative is transitioning from its data-gathering and planning phase into leadership development. Fittingly, the priests of the Diocese are leading this phase.

Sisters of Charity of the Immaculate Conception, Covington, Kentucky, are leading this phase.

suffered the pain of loss. Her youth was troubled by her mother’s death and by two sisters entering the convent. But on Christmas 1887, Thérèse experienced a conversion that released her spiritual sadness.

“Love filled my heart. I forgot myself, and henceforth I was happy,” she said.

The next year, when Thérèse was only 15, the bishop allowed her to join the Carmelite convent at Lisieux. She wanted to become a missionary and a martyr, but soon realized that neither option was open to a cloistered nun. So she sought the Holy Spirit for another way to serve the Lord Jesus. Reflecting on Scripture, Thérèse learned to do the loving thing in every situation, which she discovered was the fuel that fired the faith of martyrs and saints. Doing the least of actions for love became the secret of her “little way.”

What does a 19th-century nun have to do with us? Juggling the duties of family, work or school, navigating freeways and keeping up with the digital world, we don’t have much time for pursuing holiness, do we? But that’s where Thérèse sets the example for us. Her simplicity shows us that we, too, can be holy.

This Advent, following the saints, may we decide always to love God above all and to do the loving thing in every circumstance.

Spending this Advent season with the saints

Bert Ghiozzi

OSV News

Advent prepares us for Jesus’ coming at Christmas and for his coming into our lives. To do that, no one knows how to get ready to welcome Christ better than the saints. They express their love for him by putting him first in their hearts. They make room for him by clearing out the clutter of sins and faults. The saints pursue holiness by embracing the Lord’s teaching and lifestyle. They respond to his graces by practicing spiritual disciplines like prayer, Scripture study, fasting and almsgiving. And the saints express their love for God by reaching out to others with the Good News. They especially dedicate themselves to caring for the poor and marginalized. So, let’s make the most of this Advent and spend it with three representative saints, imitating the ways that they opened their hearts to Jesus. Week 1 we learn from St. Thérèse of Lisieux.

Entering the spiritual space of John the Baptist

One of my favorite places on earth is the great Cathedral of Chartres, located about an hour by train length of Paris. For me, it represents the richest expression of Gothic architecture, and the Gothic is, again for me, the most religiously evocative type of architecture. When I was a doctoral student in Paris many years ago, I would journey as often as I could to Chartres, and each time that I approached the building, I did so not in the manner of tourist, but as a seeker coming to the end of a pilgrimage.

Chartres is famous, of course, for its transept- and aedicular glass, but it also boasts hundreds of exquisitely rendered sculptures of biblical figures. On the north porch of the cathedral, there is a statue that I particularly savour. It is a depiction of John the Baptist, and it shows him as an emaciated figure (after all, the Bible tells us that he ate locusts and wild honey) holding an image of the Lamb of God. But what is most striking about the sculpture is the face of the Baptist. He bears an expression that bespeaks aching, a longing toward something that he does not have but wants. Some of the saints that surround Chartres Cathedral seem blissful, already in possession of the great good for which they longed. But not John the Baptist. He yearns, pines, hungers still.

And this makes him, par excellence, a saint of Advent.

My family made a recent visit to the new museum at the National Shrine of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton in Emmitsburg, Maryland. I’ve always been drawn to St. Elizabeth because I remember how it fascinated me as a child that she was a woman ordained to a nun, not to mention the first canonized saint born in the United States.

The newly redesigned museum has much to offer any visitor, but I was particularly struck by that day hoping to find something about her life that could inspire our oldest son as he prepares for his First Holy Communion in the coming weeks. And as I looked through the rosary, something that stuck me anawe on this visit was the love St. Elizabeth had for the Lord’s real presence in the Blessed Sacrament.

Something that particularly stuck out to me, thanks to one of the exhibits, was how significant St. Elizabeth’s first Holy Communion was in her life. Dipping into this pivotal day in her life a bit more later, I came to learn that St. Elizabeth had so longed for the Lord the night ahead of her first reception of the sacrament that she lay awake “burning” with desire. And as she made the 2-mile journey so quickly to the church that next morning, she wrote, “I seemed to have come to the throne of God.”

This holy season, of course, calls to mind the coming (adventus) of Jesus in history but it also anticipates the arrival of the Lord at the end of the age, that time when, as St. Paul puts it, Christ “will be all in all” (1 Cor. 15:28).

The attainment of any of these goods produces a momentary bliss followed by a letdown, a disappointment. But this truth mustn’t be allowed to deprive us of it; rather, it should compel us to adopt the spiritual stance that the spiritual masters call “detachment.” This means enjoying wealth and then letting it go, using power for good but not clinging to it; taking in honor and not caring a whiff for it. It is to adopt the attitude that St. Ignatius of Loyola calls “indifference.” Advent is a privileged time to practice this virtue.

This and final suggestion is this: we should devote ourselves to doing one of the corporal works of mercy. These acts — feeding the hungry, giving drink to the thirsty, clothing the naked, visiting the imprisoned, etc. — are concrete acts of love. It is easy enough for religious people to speak of love in an abstract manner, but to love means to will the good of the other. Therefore, it is dense, real, particular, something that shows up. And heaven — that ultimate joy that we long for — is nothing other than love, love in the fullest possible sense, love without limit. Aquinas says that in heaven, faith will fade away (since we will see God face to face) and hope will disappear (since we would have attained what we hoped for), but love will remain (since heaven is love).

So, as we move into the spiritual space of John the Baptist, as we enter the season of Advent, we should pray we could let go, and we should perform the works of mercy.

So, when we love someone here below, in the simplest way, we anticipate our return to the homeland, we stir our craving for heaven.

So, as we move into the spiritual space of John the Baptist, as we enter the season of Advent, we should pray we could let go, and we should perform the works of mercy.

It's time for a family and spiritual reset

Back in 2015, newly engaged, I signed on the dotted line (and initiated about 135 times) before departing from the cozy conference room with a new-to-me house. Before I left, the former owner looked at me and said, “What are you looking for in this space?”

I looked at him, looked at the house, smiled and said, “Fill it up.”

Eight years, one fabulous wedding and three beautiful gifts from God later, I look back at that moment with great gratitude to God for his tremendous blessings, but with a certain irony. The once-echoy house is now one of the world’s, if not the point of being stuffed.

Stacks of papers, boxes of books never unpacked, and unused furniture clogs our space and robs our peace. Over time, the sunroom has morphed into a playroom, the living room into an office space. Despite our best efforts, toys and kid books are spread throughout the house. The spare bedroom is covered with stuff, we used to be able to see the small seating area in the master bedroom, and the socks — oh, the tiny socks — are the gifts that keep on giving. And there are only five of us.

When I finally reached my limit, I decided I was going to take small steps to order our space and reflect the important priorities of our family. My husband, plenty tired of not being able to step foot in our closet, was more than game. So we began strategizing, shifted some storage around in the kitchen, allowing for a little more counter space. My husband purchased school desks for the kids and created their own work spaces. We tackled the closet in tandem, being rewarded with seven bags of clothes for the local Catholic charity: “Ruthless,” we said to each other: “We have to be ruthless.”

My brain kept coming back to one central point. This home reset, as we have taken to calling it, isn’t just about cleaning out drawers, having additional counter space, or being able to actually sit on a chair (although those things are very nice), it’s about being thoughtful about how we want to live as a family. It’s about the kind of priorities we want to have and, for the growing-ups, model. It’s about how we want to teach our little ones to be observant and vigilant. The next four weeks of Advent are the perfect time to reign in our hearts and our home.

Of course, there are many parallels to the spiritual life here. When we don’t take the time to examine and, if necessary, reset our relationship with God — when we cover him up with stacks of “to-do” lists, which get the stress and clutter in the corner — everything suffers. When we don’t give God our attention and our hearts, it becomes easier to forget how important it is to give our attention and our heart to others. We fall into self-absorption, where our own needs and wants become the priority and thus a barrier to a room in our home that is a sanctuary.

Like with our homes, when we feel our lives spinning out of control spiritually or emotionally or if we notice our relationships suffering, we need to take time for a reset. We must stop, pray, go to confession, to mass, reach out to a friend, to make a meal, to have some time in our home. It’s time for a family and spiritual reset.

Sharing the blessings of Benedict

This past weekend was our annual retreat for Oblates culminating in the Oblation Ritual on Sunday at Noonday Prayer and dinner with the sisters’ community. I was privileged to lead the 10 women gathered on Friday evening through Saturday in presentations, discussions and activities in order to get to know Saints Benedict and Scholastica better, to understand the Rule of Benedict that was the fruit of the saints’ mutual endeavor in the 6th Century and to discern how we apply the norms to our lives today.

The Oblates themselves had chosen the topic for the retreat, which I agreed is a good way to enter into the world of Benedict and get some hints about the reason for various rules as well as the goal for choosing to follow him/her. I shared with them that I was drawn to Benedictine life in my high school days because I too had heard Benedict’s questions: “Who of you desires life in abundance, who is willing to work for the Kingdom?”

Benedict’s Life, and each other’s, shared one thing — that Benedict’s life, and our lives, are so busy often, so full of good things. But, this holy season is given to us by the Church to slow down, to refocus. Have you been in a rush to get somewhere and find the person driving in front of you going EXTREMELY slow? Sadly, this happens to me all too often. After I’ve made my “comments” to the driver (windows closed of course), I usually remind that I’m in the wrong and beg forgiveness through a wave culpa (a execus maxima culpa), and that the Good Lord has placed that slow car in front of me for a purpose — that I slow down. This slowing down is of course for my own safety and the safety of those around me, but it is also, I believe, to slow me down internally — to focus my mind and heart on that which is important. It is in a real way an “Omen.”

We all need to slow down, both with the externals and the interior life. Let this holy time give us the time to watch for the coming of the Lord. If we aren’t careful — if we are going too fast — if we are too busy — we may miss the interior life of this holy time: give us the time to slow our lives and the safety of those around us, but it is also, I believe, to slow me down internally — to focus my mind and heart on that which is important. It is in a real way an “Omen.”

A decade later, Pope Francis ‘Evangelii Gaudium’ continues to resonate

Maria Wiering
OSV News

“The joy of the Gospel fills the hearts and lives of all who encounter Jesus. Those who accept his offer of salvation are set free from sin, sorrow, inner emptiness and loneliness. With Christ joy is constantly born anew.” Pope Francis wrote in the opening of “Evangelii Gaudium,” a 2013 document many have interpreted as the new pope’s presentation of his vision for the contemporary church.

Released 10 years ago Nov. 24, the document’s message is as relevant as ever, several theologians and evangelization experts told OSV News.

“Jesus is the son of God who took flesh to be with us. … It’s this reality that I think Pope Francis has in a deep, deep level in his personal life, and it does radiate out through the document,” said Curtis Martin, founder of the Fellowship of Catholic University Students, or FOCUS, a Denver-based organization for evangelizing college students.

“Evangelii Gaudium” — subtitled “On the Proclamation of the Gospel in Today’s World” — is widely considered Pope Francis’ first major document. The encyclical “Lumen Fidei,” released five months earlier in June, was signed by Pope Francis but largely drafted by Pope Benedict XVI before his February 2013 resignation.

“I dream of a ‘missionary option,’ that is, a missionary impulse capable of transforming everything, so that the Church’s customs, ways of doing things, times and schedules, language and structures can be suitably channeled for the evangelization of today’s world rather than for her self-preservation,” Pope Francis wrote.

The apostolic exhortation followed the October 2012 XIII Ordinary General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops on the new evangelization, over which Pope Benedict presided. Its publication also coincided with the end of the Year of Faith.

Martin was among the lay observers participating in the synod. Notably, Cardinal Jorge Bergoglio — the future Pope Francis — was not among its bishop members, but “Evangelii Gaudium,” while not labeled a “post-synodal” exhortation, reflects both the conversation at the synod as well as Pope Francis’ vision for the church, Martin said.

“It is my favorite of Pope Francis’ documents,” he said, noting FOCUS asks its campus missionaries to read the document — which runs about 90,000 words — “cover to cover.”

“The theme of the joy of the Gospel is so, so critical,” Martin said. “My experience is that Catholics know the Gospel, they know that Jesus died for our sins, they know that he rose from the dead. They know that. But it doesn’t necessarily become the central part of their lives.

“And the whole point of the document was, if Jesus becomes the central reality, central person, of your life, you will begin to experience joy,” Martin continued, “because when you allow Jesus in the center of your life, you also bring the Father and the Holy Spirit. And the fruits of the Spirit are love and joy and peace, patience, kindness, goodness, gentleness. … Joy is the one gift that you can’t get away from. Everyone wants to be joyful.”

The document emphasizes the centrality of the “evangema,” the proclamation of the Gospel message. “On the lips of the catechist the first proclamation must ring out over and over. Jesus Christ loves you; he gave his life to save you; and now he is living at your side every day to enlighten, strengthen and free you.” Pope Francis wrote.

Organized into five chapters, “Evangelii Gaudium” is wide ranging, with comments on the poor and consumerism, welcoming Muslims and the importance of beauty.

It ends with a reflection on Mary, with Pope Francis noting, “There is a Marian ‘style’ to the Church’s work of evangelization. Whenever we look to Mary, we come to believe once again in the revolutionary nature of love and tenderness.”

It closes with a six-stanza prayer for Mary’s intercession, culminating in “Mother of the living Gospel, wellspring of happiness for God’s little ones, pray for us.”

Massimo Faggioli, a professor of theology and religious studies at Villanova University in Philadelphia, who studies Pope Francis, described “Evangelii Gaudium” in 2013 as “the manifesto of Francis.” He told OSV News that it has stood the test of time.

“What stood out to me 10 years ago was … a natural fit for his future.”

Calling down the Holy Spirit: the Epiclesis

Father Luke Spannagel
USCCB

What is the “Epiclesis”? How do we even pronounce it? A common pronunciation is Epp-eh-clie-sis.) Charles Belmonte teaches, “In the Epiclesis, the priest requests God the Father to send the Holy Spirit so that the bread and wine offered may become Christ’s Body and Blood and so we may be able to celebrate the Eucharistic mystery, and to make all the effects of the sacrament operative in us. At the same time, the priest extends his hands, palms down, over the chalice and host, and traces the sign of the cross over them. With this gesture, he asks God to pour his blessing over the gifts offered and to turn them into his Son’s body and blood” (“Understanding the Mass,” p. 138). That is a lot of action for a few quick words! This is an important moment because it gives us notice about what is soon to come: the changing of the bread and wine into the very Body and Blood of Jesus.

According to the Diocese of Peoria, “The Epiclesis is the invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the gifts to be offered... It is through the power of the Holy Spirit who descended upon the apostles at Pentecost that the priest, through his hands, offers the human gifts and earthly elements to be consecrated into Godly gifts and heavenly realities. Often we may hear the ‘sanctus bell’ to call our attention to this invocation and calling down of the Holy Spirit’ (‘A Study of the Mass,’ p. 14). This might be a good time to mention the use of bells which, depending on your local traditions, you may hear a few different times during the Eucharistic Prayer, including at the Sanctus, Epiclesis, elevation of the Body and Blood of Jesus after Consecration, and after the priest receives Communion. Why bells? Perhaps especially our students will recognize the importance of bells (or similar signals) which help call our attention to a significant moment. For me, during my school years, the lunchtime bell was always a welcome sound! Similarly, during the Eucharistic Prayer, the sound of a bell can direct our attention to important moments, such as kneeling in preparation for Jesus who is to become present, asking the Holy Spirit to make our gifts of bread and wine worthy for the sacrifice of Mass, looking upon our Lord truly present in adoration elevated above the altar, or in our immediate preparation for Holy Communion. Although some may note that the bell is a tradition from times past when people often didn’t know the language of the prayers, in humble honesty, many of us will recognize that we still often need a call to attention so we don’t miss these important moments.

Although we normally think of the Epiclesis as the calling down of the Holy Spirit in anticipation of the changing of the gifts into the Most Holy Eucharist, as is often the case with the prayers of the Mass, there is even more there. Fr. Guy Oury explains, “The sign of acknowledgment and acceptance by God will be fruitful union with the sacrifice... But there can be more than one reason for this prayer. It may be to ask for acceptance of the sacrifice. It may also be to ask for fruitful participation in the sacrifice through Holy Communion. Or it may be to ask for the Consecration” (The Mass, p. 100).

The bottom line is that we know we need the Holy Spirit. So, the next time you hear that bell or see the priest extend his hands palms down over the offering, remember that we are asking the Holy Spirit to sanctify the gifts and each one of our hearts.

Formerly enslaved Catholic married couple are recognized as Underground Railroad agents

Ruby Thomas

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — The late James Madison Smith Sr. and Catherine "Kitty" Smith, formerly enslaved Catholics, are being recognized as agents of the Underground Railroad.

The Smiths, a freed married couple, are buried in St. Louis Cemetery in Louisville in a once-segregated section of the cemetery.

The U.S. Department of the Interior’s National Park Service announced in late September that the Smiths’ burial site would be included in the National Underground Railroad Network to Freedom. Its mission is to “honor, preserve and promote the history of resistance to enslavement through escape and flight,” according to its website.

During the 1860s, worsening conditions for Black people in the South led the Smiths to move from Louisville to Jennings County, Indiana. Their farm — located about 29 miles from the Ohio River — became a shelter for enslaved people fleeing for freedom, said Deacon Ned Berghausen, who led the effort to recognize the Smiths.

Years earlier, James Madison Smith had purchased his freedom and that of Catherine Smith and they were married in 1837 at St. Louis Church, now the site of the Cathedral of the Assumption.

In a recent interview with The Record, Louisville’s archdiocesan newspaper, Deacon Berghausen said that historical records show the couple were part of a community of free and enslaved Black Catholics who worshipped at St. Louis. The community “supported each other in faith and the fight for freedom,” he said.

The Smiths “risked their lives for freedom for others,” said Deacon Berghausen, who serves at St. Agnes Church. “I think they were moved by the Gospel, particularly the Gospel of Luke where Jesus Christ said he’s come to proclaim liberty to captives.”

The Smiths’ story is good news, said M. Annette Mandle-Turner, executive director of the Archdiocese of Louisville’s Office of Multicultural Ministry, who received the news of the recognition with excitement because it’s what the Black community needs to help them “keep on keeping on.”

“We as a church will receive it as good news,” said Mandle-Turner.

The Madisons had “vision” and the kind of faith that helped many African Americans believe that “God would always be there to bring us through it no matter what,” said Mandle-Turner. “They (Smiths) had a life and they lived it as fully as they could, given the time.”

For Mandle-Turner, it prompts the question, “If they could do that, what does it mean for us?”

She said the answer may be: “We have to keep on keeping on. We can’t allow what appears to be hopelessness to take away our dream.”

Deacon Berghausen agreed the Smiths’ story is good news.

“His is a story of freedom and a story of faith,” he said. “It’s a story about people whose story has been forgotten but deserves to be remembered and recognized.”

Starting in the late 1860s, the Smiths lived in downtown Louisville in a community of more than 1,000 free Black individuals. The city’s population was 41,000 and an additional 5,432 enslaved people lived in the city, Deacon Berghausen said.

“I think of Madison, who owns this store in downtown Louisville without full rights,” and how individuals could have taken advantage of that, he said.

He noted that historical records describe a fight in the streets outside the store between James Madison Smith and another individual.

“You get a sense of why they’d have to leave for Indiana when things get too oppressive,” said Deacon Berghausen.

Though they left Louisville, the couple remained connected to the Black Catholic community.

Historical records show them returning to the city to witness weddings and baptisms of friends. The Smiths’ 25-year-old son, James Madison Smith Jr., died in 1888. He was buried in St. Louis Cemetery in the same plot as his parents, said Deacon Berghausen.

The couple also had a daughter, Mary Laurinda Smith, who became a well-known suffragist in Oregon.
Women break stereotypes to encourage interreligious dialogue in violence-torn Nigeria

Valentine Benjamin

GSM News

While religion was originally an issue linked to conflicts in the country, deeply rooted religious hostility has in recent decades created a divide between Christians and Muslims in Nigeria, Africa’s most populous nation. Now, when the state of religious freedom in the country is called “abysmal,” an interreligious duo is working together to make a push for religious tolerance.

“It’s not a Christian and Muslim conflict but a group which feels they are in conflict with security issues and religion isn’t the right way,” Sister Agatha Chikezie said.

Sister Agatha is a Nigerian Catholic woman religious from the Congregation of Daughters of Mary Mother of Mercy. Along with her counterpart, Alhaja Bola Usman, a Muslim woman who is a retired Nigerian Customs officer, they are building a movement of women of faith to stand up against violence and search for peaceful coexistence in Nigeria.

The duo started their efforts in 2006, just one year before the insurrection by Boko Haram terrorists in the northeast region of Nigeria. In 2012, Sister Agatha and Usman institutionalized the network.

The terrorist group has since targeted and killed civilians. In 2014, the sect kidnapped 276 students from a girls’ school in Chibok, and nine years later, 98 girls are still being held by Boko Haram. Other groups such as Fulani herdsmen are violently targeting Christian communities, killing people and forcing them from their villages.

The security situation has further been complicated by other militia groups targeting Christians. In the most recent gruesome news from the country, a Catholic novice of the Benedictine monastery in Nigeria’s northern Iruka Keva State, Brother Mark Onyeachochi Godwin Eze was abducted and killed by his kidnappers, and his body was thrown into the river. He was buried Nov 22. Terrorism and persecution of Christians are constantly a great concern for Nigerian citizens.

A new report released by Open Doors, an international organization monitoring global Christian persecution, said that more than 360 million Christians suffer high levels of persecution and discrimination for their faith in countries across the world.

No fewer than 5,621 Christians were killed for their faith last year. Ninety percent of these were from Nigeria alone, with the country’s levels of violence toward Christians marked as “extreme” by Open Doors.

“The jihadist movement, which seeks to expand Sharia (law) across the continent, has forced Christians into constant motion, from their homes to displacement camps, or to other countries,” Open Doors said.

“Religious insecurity stemming from this experience of forced displacement makes Christians even more vulnerable to further violence. Christian women, in particular, can be easily targeted for sexual attack, while men are more likely to lose their lives,” the organization added.

Nigeria is about equally divided: a little more than half the country’s 225 million people are Muslim, a little fewer than half are Christian.

Sister Agatha, who has read the Quran and has made many Muslim friends, told GSM News she doesn’t see the terrorist sect as a force but as misguided fanatics. “It’s a fallacy that doesn’t exist anywhere in the Quran, when you kill one person unjustly; it’s as if you have killed the whole nation.”

She added that the holy book of Muslims states that “even if you kill mistakenly you’ll have to do a lot of atonement.”

Born in the eastern part of Nigeria into a family of six in 1973 in Anambra, the southeastern region of Nigeria, Sister Agatha is the director-secretary of the Interereligious Dialogue Office of the Archdiocese of Abuja and co-chair of the Nigeria Women of Faith Peacebuilding Network.

The activity of the network focuses on bringing Muslim and Christian women together to tackle issues tied to interreligious conflicts and domestic violence against women — two topics that are deeply woven into the fabric of the northern region.

“When we started … there were challenges; it was more difficult to get Christian women than Muslims. Eventually when we all came together, it was more like an eye-opener,” Sister Agatha said.

Over time, she said, “we discussed issues that were affecting us as Nigerians; we discussed issues of social injustices, bad governance, economic breakdown, insecurity and abuse of religion. Gradually these women began to trust us; the wall of fear began to collapse.”

The interfaith network organizes annual fellowship programs on interreligious dialogue and mediation to build the capacities of religious leaders to become peace builders in their respective communities and also mediate and dialogue for peace during conflicts with all representatives of different religious organizations in Nigeria.

The network also offers training in broad making, fashion design and other activities to make women come together and invite coexistence.

Co-founder Usman may be from a different religion, but one thing the 62-year-old grandmother has in common with Sister Agatha is her thirst for humanity.

Alhaja Bola would wear her hijab and walk into the church. And when they observe her at the gate, she won’t get angry or go back, rather she would smile and give me a telephone (call), while I wear my habit, and walk into the mosque with the rosary and Bible,” Sister Agatha said.

“All these happened at the peak of the Boko Haram attacks,” she said.

Usman was educated at St. Bernard Catholic School in southwestern Nigeria. This gave her a vast understanding of the Bible and exposure to how to override negative impressions and perspectives between Muslim and Christians.

She prays the Hail Mary and recites the Angelus, a Catholic devotion commemorating the immaculate conception. “When I was saying Hail Mary full of grace, Sister Agatha was amazed that a Muslim woman was saying the rosary,” Usman said.

Their work is being supported by the Swiss Embassy and the Cardinal John Onayekan Foundation For Peace, an organization working for peace in northern Nigeria.

The document “talks about that missionary joy — that it’s something that brings people in,” she said. “It’s not just a happiness, not a human happiness — like you’re having a nice glass of wine and a big steak, and you’re happy for a little bit — but it’s a joy where you recognize they have something.”

The document is more important today than ever, Wahlquist said, “because of what we’re living in around us can seem so joyless.”

But, she said, “I see that the Gospel has been proclaimed and that it’s bearing fruit, and you know that’s a result of joy.”
Pope, still suffering from the flu, urges prayers for peace at audience

Cindy Wooden
Catholic News Service

With a soft and raspy voice, Pope Francis began his weekly general audience by making the sign of the cross and explaining that “I’m still not well with this flu, and my voice isn’t great,” so he would have an aide read his catechism and greetings.

The gathering in the Vatican’s Paul VI Audience Hall Nov. 29, was held the morning after the Vatican announced that Pope Francis had accepted his doctors’ advice and canceled plans to travel to Dubai, United Arab Emirates, Dec. 1-3 to join world leaders in addressing COP28, the U.N. climate conference.

Before the general audience, the pope met briefly with members of the Scottish soccer team Celtic F.C. There, too, he apologized for having an aide read his prepared text. “With this cold,” he said, “I can’t speak much, but I’m better than yesterday.”

The pope’s main general audience talk, part of a yearlong series about evangelization, was read by Msgr. Filippo Ciampaglioni, an official of the Vatican Secretariat of State. But at the end of the audience, the pope took the microphone back to urge people to pray for peace.

“Let’s continue to pray for the serious situation in Israel and Palestine. Peace, please, peace,” the pope said. “I hope that the cease-fire in Gaza continues so that all the hostages (taken by Hamas) are released, and access is allowed for the necessary humanitarian aid” in Gaza.

Pope Francis, who speaks regularly by telephone with priests at Holy Family parish in Gaza City, told people at the audience, “I’ve heard from the parish there. There is a lack of water, a lack of bread. The people are suffering. The simple people. The people are suffering, not those who are making the war. We ask for peace.”

And speaking of peace, let’s not forget the dear Ukrainian people who still are suffering so much because of the war,” he said. “Brothers and sisters, war is always a defeat. Everyone loses. Well, not everyone; there is one group that earns a lot—those who manufacture weapons. They make a lot off the death of others.”

Pope Francis also used the opportunity to thank a group of circus performers—acrobat, skaters, clowns and jugglers—who had entertained the pope and the crowd for a few minutes. They train hard and bring joy to people, the pope said.

In his main talk, read by Msgr. Ciampaglioni, Pope Francis focused on how salvation in Jesus is as necessary as ever and that people today need to hear the Gospel proclaimed even if society tries to convince them that “God is insignificant and useless.”

Simply repeating formulaic expressions of faith will convince no one, the pope said. And neither will shouting. “A truth does not become more credible because one raises one’s voice in speaking it, but because it is witnessed with one’s life,” the pope’s text said.

Ave Maria University offers free Catholic online courses

AVE MARIA, Fla. — Ave Maria University this year has become the latest Catholic university to launch a series of seven video courses presented by university faculty that provides practical wisdom and insights on interesting topics and themes to help Catholics contemplate the true, good and beautiful. The series of seven video courses thus far, which can also be accessed at htp://universityofavemaria.edu and via apps, covers a variety of subjects with broad appeal. Each video course is between one to three hours and broken down into segments for ease of viewing, addressing themes such as art, science and philosophy; marriage and relationships; scripture and sanctity; and the foundations of America. “We want to be a resource and a haven for the life of the church and society,” Rector Nuvanir, Ave Maria’s president and professor of theology, said. “We want to provide Catholics with edifying content that helps them to joyfully recognize the truth, beauty and goodness we all crave.”

Texas immigration bill will likely face legal challenge

AUSTIN, Texas — Gov. Greg Abbott, R-Texas, is expected to sign a controversial immigration bill that would make it a state crime to cross into Texas from Mexico. Catholic organizations including the Texas Catholic Conference of Bishops have opposed the legislation. The bill, Senate Bill 4, was passed by Republican majorities in both the House and Senate in November, making unauthorably crossing Texas’ international border a state crime separate from a federal one. Supporters of the legislation maintain their proposal would counter unauthorized entry into the state by empowering law enforcement, while opponents argue it is unconstitutional and unworkable. Jennifer Allman, executive director of the Texas Catholic Conference of Bishops, wrote on the group’s website that the legislation is “grossly improper” and “would create deadly consequences for innocent migrants.” She added it is unlikely to survive a challenge in federal court. Justin Kaye, senior director of Immigration and Refugee Services at Catholic Charities of Central Texas in Austin, told the Texas House State Affairs Committee in Nov. 9 testimony that while “the church supports the right of a sovereign nation to control its borders,” the “obligation to control the international border lies with federal authorities.” He added, “Immigration enforcement should be exercised in a way that is targeted, proportional and humane.” It was not immediately clear when Abbott may sign the bill.

Remembering Moscow’s campaign of ‘death by hunger’

KYIV, Ukraine — Ukrainian church leaders have joined anniversary commemorations of the 1932-1933 Holodomor, or Great Famine, in which millions died in a disaster deliberately engineered by Soviet Russian rulers. “Sixty years ago,” said Church of the Resurrection of Christ, the nation’s first sustained religious community for Black Baltimoreans — more than 80 of what was then the second-largest city in the country. It was in that milieu that two women’s religious communities minster to those afflicted with the disease: the Sisters of Charity, a religious community founded by St. Elizabeth Ann Seton in Emmitsburg that was then limited to whites, and the Oblate Sisters of Providence, the world’s first sustained religious community for Black women founded in Baltimore by Mother Mary Lange, a candidate for sainthood who in June was declared “venerable.” Both communities made heroic contributions trying to save lives, but the whole religious community received most of the accolades, yet the Black religious sisters did not receive the same level of public acknowledgment. Adrienne Curry, director of the Archdiocese of Baltimore’s Office of Black Catholic Ministries, said it’s “obvious” racism played a role. More than 100 years later, Catholic and civic leaders are rectifying that disparity. The City Council passed a resolution Oct. 2 honoring the Oblate Sisters of Providence for their 184 years of service.
Thanksgiving — many are blessed

Pickup day for the Catholic Charities Thanksgiving Meal giveaway, Nov. 26, was rainy but that did not dampen the spirits of volunteers and donors. Meal pickups were held at Catholic Charities in Covington, St. Edward Church, Owenton, St. James Church, Brooksville and Holy Spirit Church, Newport. Donations were received from St. Pius X Parish and Blessed Sacrament Parish to provide 161 meals to families across the Diocese of Covington.

“This outpouring of love from the donors and volunteers is overwhelming, and such a great example of serving others in need,” said Vicky Bauert, institutional advancement manager, Diocese of Covington. “Our friends receiving the meals expressed words of gratitude for the donors and volunteers, ‘you all are like little angels running around out in the cold and rainy weather for us, thank you so much,’ and ‘we would not have had a traditional Thanksgiving meal this year without your help, thank you and have a blessed day.’ We are all so fortunate in so many ways to be part of this generous community.”

The angel said to them, ‘Do not be afraid.’
